The Colorado Child Care Assistance Program (CCCAP) helps families pay for child care.

Licensed child care providers, as well as Qualified Exempt providers (family, friends, and neighbors who provide child care without a child care license), may be eligible to become CCCAP providers.

CCCAP offers some providers financial stability through consistent monthly payments.

“Well, I think it's a good program to be honest. It helps us out as providers to make sure that we have that money coming in, because there's a lot of times when parents can't afford [child care] and sometimes you don't get paid.”

“I know I'm getting paid on time.”

CCCAP offered financial relief during the pandemic by paying for absences.

“Continually being paid through CCCAP when I had parents who couldn't work made a huge difference...If I wouldn't have gotten anything from CCCAP, I would have had no income, or very little income, and it would have made a big impact if they didn't honor absences like they did.”

It feels good to help children and families in the local community.

“It's really important to give equal access, and CCCAP is a way we can make sure we're reaching low-income families and creating more accessible child care in the community.”

“I had CCCAP parents that came into my program ... and went back to school. Without the CCCAP, that wouldn't have happened. ...One mom got her GED...and went to college. All because she could get [CCCAP] to go back to school, to better herself for her child... And I got to go to her graduation.”
